Session Overview

Over one in five New Yorkers provide support to family members or friends who have significant health and long term care needs. In fact, they provide most of the community based long term care services. This is especially true among the middle aged and older New Yorker residents who may find themselves providing care to both seniors and children with major health needs. Many face difficult challenges in finding needed assistance and balancing their caregiver and work related responsibilities. Caregiver burnout is a very real problem.

In this session you will learn about:

- How to plan for meeting the needs of a family member who needs care.
- Tips for having difficult discussions with parents or grandparents who face significant health or chronic care conditions.
- How to coordinate and communicate with siblings and other family members.
- Tips for dealing with hospitals, nursing homes and other care providers.
- Resources that can help informal caregivers do a better job.
